Danbury Hatters' Bitter Tragedy May Be Stopped by Help From America's Workers—Aged Men and Widows Pitiable Victims in Suit.

Six hundred pairs of hands are today stretched out in supplication to the working men of America by those who face the loss of their humble homes and savings through the famous Danbury hatters' strike suit. All of the hands are not those of men; some of the are the hands of women and little children. Many of the hands are old and wrinkled and stained from years of toil in the great hat factories of the town that make headgear for the millions. Many of the hands held out in this great plea for the generosity of labor are those of persons who had nothing directly to do with the strike against the D. E. Loewe company 14 years ago which led up to a court judgment of $250,000 against 189 members of the hatters' union and the attachment of their bank savings and their 125 homes in which 600 persons live.

Organized labor will work one hour today for the Danbury hatters, victims of a $252,000 fine imposed by the U. S. supreme court for violating the Sherman anti-trust law in
